Tutorials: Intro VideoA new survival index for complications of liver cirrhosis. An index of the probability of survival time was proposed for the complications of cirrhosis of the liver based on the Cox regression model. For the eight major complications of cirrhosis observed during an average 11.5-year follow-up period (95% confidence interval 8.5 to 15.4 years) 986 in-hospital deaths were recorded. A total of 170 deaths were attributable to each complication (an estimated mean mortality of 19.4 per 1000 patient years), except for variceal bleeding (0.8 per 1000 patient years). The empirical survival distribution of the index was compared with that obtained using the linear transformation of the logarithm of the "observed" survival time, both in the presence and absence of a competing risk. The transformed index lost its natural relationship with the time horizon but the "paradox of proportionality" was fully eliminated. The new index had a better discriminatory power than the "observed" survival time. Application of the new index to the total series of patients with and without complications, gave a similar distribution of the index as that observed in the series of patients with only one complication. This index, which takes into account the entire life of the patients under study, seems to be of great interest in planning and evaluating services and can be used for any complication of cirrhosis independently of its incidence in the population studied. All ladies; you seem to want to believe that since you have genitalia that you're a woman and people are more or less going to treat you as such. This is a very limited outlook of reality. Do not get me wrong; there are women out there who have unrealistic ideas of what it means to be a woman. But there are also men who have ridiculous ideas about what men 50b96ab0b6
